BLUNDERS OF AUTHORS.

Queer Things of Which Fiction Characters Are Guilty.

For many years a favorite pastime of the literary dilettante has been to ferret out mistakes made by celebratal authors. Writers of the highest standing have been guilty of absurd "bloomers," such as Flaubert's assertion that "the two adversaries were placed at an equal distance from each other." Mistakes of this sort have been excused on the ground that the authors were working under pressure of inspiration and were therefore likely at any time to make minor errors. Stories of today do not, as a rule, appear to be written under the stress of temperamental excitement. Yet, in spite of their seemingly cool sophistication, they are not lacking in curious have written that they were coming and mony of corner stone laying at the Odd mistakes. A short list of these errors Philadelphia Ledger:
